

My husband and I recently went on the Marriage Course. Being a Catholic I thought I had an idea of what sort of topics we would be discussing, so I tried to give George a bit of information. I couldn't have been more wrong. I think we both expected the course to be very religion based, and as George is a non-Catholic, he was concerned that he would 'stand out'. The course leaders were all happily married women and gave us all the tricks of the trade on how to ensure your marriage is a happy one. We came home with a pack each that had the activities we had done and other little bits and bobs that we have since gone back to look at and they are really lovely to keep.

We would definitely recommend the course to anyone who is getting married. Some points are obvious and you may think to yourself, 'I already knew that', but just go with it. You're all in the same boat and it's really nice to sit and talk to other engaged couples! I understand in the run up to a wedding, there are so many appointments to go to and things to pick up etc. however I would definitely recommend taking one day off from the planning to think about what happens after the wedding day, and this course helps you look to the future, after the great wedding!
